We used to plant cabbage
on long sunny evenings.
His steel spade sliced
the cool clay, readied
for the new shoots.
I placed them quick and deep
—a foot apart
rows of green rosaries.
Winter would see us
at the marketplace.

There was a rhythm in him season-schooled: devotion to the land, handed down from famine times.