

British History

Concentrations within the History Major

The FAU Department of History now offers a concentration in either British History or Religious History, for those history majors who have specific interests in these areas.

The concentration in British History builds on the unique expertise of FAU's history faculty and is particularly suited to those students who desire to learn about the background of many social, economic, political, religious, and scientific ideas and institutions that have their roots in British history. While the British Empire is nearly a distant memory, the impact of British culture on many parts of the world remains. Many of the internationally-recognized principles of representative democracy, scientific and technological progress, modern capitalism, religious toleration, and human rights and personal liberties, emerged out of a foundational British context. It is hoped that an in-depth study of the contested lineage of many of these seminal ideas and institutions will provide a more nuanced knowledge and a better understanding of their wider applications.

For this reason the British History concentration is broadly comprehensive and also includes opportunities to study the nation's broader influence beyond the British Isles themselves.

Upon graduation, all students who fulfill the concentration's requirements will have it noted on their official university academic transcript.

The requirements for the British History concentration are as follows:

Concentrations in British History

Students must take the three core courses below and choose two from the list of elective courses.

Core Courses:

Medieval England	EUH 4500	3
Modern Britain	EUH 4502	3
Tudor-Stuart England	EUH 4511	3

Elective Courses:

Colonial America	AMH 4110	3
History of Modern India	ASH 4550	3
British Empire	EUH 4530	3
Any Senior Seminar, Special Topics, or 5000-level graduate course in British history.

For more information,
please contact
The Department of History:
(561)297-3840