

The Scholarly Potential of the International Tracing Service Digital Collections

Peace, Justice and Human Rights Initiative and the Raddock Eminent Scholar
Chair for Holocaust Studies

Dr. Anthony will present an overview of the history and contents of the International Tracing Service (ITS) Archive to give an impression of its immense potential to scholars and researchers.

The archive only opened to outside researchers in 2007, and until then, it had been the largest closed archive related to the Holocaust, forced labor, and Nazi persecution. This availability has unlocked important new potential for understanding the Holocaust and other Nazi-era crimes and the digital accessibility of the documents has provided opportunities for a deeper exploration of a broad range of topics related to persecution, incarceration, forced labor, mass murder, displacement, resettlement, and the legacies of those experiences.

The talk will also discuss how the collection has enabled survivors and their families to secure information about the fates of loved ones and documentation for compensation programs.

Bio: Elizabeth Anthony is the International Tracing Service (ITS) and Partnerships Program Manager at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's Jack, Joseph and Morton Mandel Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies, where she also held a 2010-2011 research fellowship. In her role she is responsible for the promotion of the scholarly use of the ITS Digital Archive, ITS-related academic programming and outreach, and partner programs with other institutions.
