Friday October 5, 2012, 1:00-2:30

Bailyn Conference Room (CU 222)

The essay critically examines the practices, tools, texts, institutions, and cross-marketing of family history media and culture in terms of gender, race, class, and intersectionality. The role of the LDS church, a perennial player in genealogical culture, is assessed, as are websites, especially FamilySearch.org and Ancestry.com, as well as discourses related to the Internet-based business of DNA genealogy. The recent crop of family history TV series—Who Do You Think You Are?, The Generations Project, African-American Lives 1 & 2, Faces of America, and Finding Your Roots—is a primary focus.
