The Division of Student Affairs recognizes that email is an efficient and cost-effective means for campus groups to reach our internal audiences. At the same time, members of the University community have expressed an aversion to unsolicited, mass-distributed internal emails. Furthermore, research suggests that the overuse of email and other mass communication mediums negatively impact the Division and more so the University’s ability to deliver messages of critical importance.

Purpose of Our Guidelines

This divisional guideline identifies instances in which mass email communication and other forms of mass communication are appropriate and allowable. This guideline also addresses how these messages are approved, and alternatives when mass communication requests are not appropriate. Its structure is drawn, in part, from the CAN-SPAM act of 2003, which makes an important distinction about the management of unsolicited email: messages must include an opt-out mechanism. In instances when members of the University community cannot opt out of a message stream, the Division and more so the University has a heightened responsibility to protect recipients from unsolicited messaging. Student Affairs Marketing reserves the right to edit content.
