

Teaching the Last Backpack Generation

The Faces of our Campus

Zachary Walker, Ph.D., is an Associate Professor with the University College London Institute of Education and author of Teaching the Last Backpack Generation. He is also a senior Fellow with the Higher Education Academy. He serves as the Academic Head of Learning and Teaching for the Department of Psychology and Human Development that leads the Masters Special Education and Inclusive Education. Walker has worked with educators and policymakers in more than 30 countries on issues of diversity and inclusion, instructional reform, and inclusive pedagogies.

Who is The Last Backpack Generation? What can we expect from them and what do they expect from us? What can we provide so that they can contribute to and flourish within workplaces and societies? This talk will explore the students entering our universities today. We will look at their lifetimes and how what they have seen, done, and know impacts how they learn, work, and play.
