Doctor of Philosophy (Ph.D.)

The doctoral degree is designed for individuals who seek the highest credential their discipline offers for personal and/or career growth. The degree is seen as a terminal degree with a unique set of required courses and experiences. Doctoral programs are designed to provide a broad set of experiences that allow leaders to bring many different perspectives to bear on the organizational problems and opportunities that confront them in practice. The doctoral of philosophy focuses on the preparation and support of practitioners, leaders, and researchers in Florida, the nation, and the international community through courses, undergraduate and graduate programs, professional learning, and community service.

~~The program assumes that educational leaders will be more effective when they are able to: 1) apply information and concepts into practice; 2) see the organization as a whole and understand how various parts of the organization relate to and affect each other; 3) discern meaning in, and establish relationships between, events and fragments of information that appear to be discrete and unrelated; and 4) learn through a community of practitioners model in which participants engage real problems and opportunities in a collegial learning team approach. Doctoral students must meet the leadership core prerequisites as identified by the program area. There are two doctoral program concentrations in the department: a) Higher Education Leadership, and b) School Leaders.~~
