CONCENTRATION IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Students must earn a "C" or better in each course taken to fulfill a concentration requirement.

Dr. Mark Tunick

Political science is a broad discipline concerned with how people with different interests and values reach collective decisions and form binding policies in order to maintain a stable and flourishing society. It studies the role of law and government and non-governmental institutions in distributing scarce resources. It takes up questions such as what makes a government legitimate? What causes revolutions and wars? How can government be arranged to realize the greatest happiness of its citizens, and what factors determine whether the ideal arrangement is achieved in practice? The Honors College concentration in political science provides the necessary groundwork for students wishing to do graduate work in political science and related disciplines, and is excellent preparation for law or business school or careers in journalism, public affairs, education, or government. Students also ~~have the opportunity to~~ can take advantage of public speaking ~~opportunities opportunities~~ including participation in ~~such as~~ the Diplomacy program and moot court.

The discipline of political science is closely connected with other disciplines, including economics, history, philosophy, and sociology. Political science itself is commonly divided into four sub-fields:

American Politics: studies the government of the United States, including the relations between the three branches (the Presidency, Congress, the Judiciary), between the federal government and the states, and between government and private interests. Students might examine health care or immigration policy, explain election outcomes, learn how to measure public opinion, or consider whether lobbying, litigating, or taking to the streets is more effective in achieving social change;

Comparative Politics: focuses on foreign (non-U.S.) political systems. Students compare different systems to evaluate the various ways in which governments respond to similar problems and meet citizen needs. Central factors for comparison include political culture, political institutions, political processes, and public policy. A comparative analysis of these factors can help us to answer questions such as why some countries are democratic while others are authoritarian, why some are well-developed politically and economically while others are not, and why some are stable while others face internal conflicts and civil wars;

International Relations: International Relations is the study of patterns of conflict and cooperation among world actors, primarily nation-states, but also international organizations, nationalist groups, religious groups, non-governmental organizations, and others. Students examine questions about the nature of the international system, the distribution of power and resources among international actors, why nations go to war and make peace, and how foreign policy is constructed. Topics for study include war and the use of force, nuclear weapons and proliferation, the politics of global welfare, development and underdevelopment, international political economy, international organizations, globalization, environmental security, and foreign policy.

Political Theory: Political theory is concerned with the nature of politics and the sort of knowledge appropriate to the study of politics. It also focuses on concepts such as justice, freedom, equality, and legitimacy, exploring how these concepts have been developed throughout history and how they bear on contemporary issues. Political theorists examine foundational questions such as: Why do people live under government? What makes government legitimate? Why should policies be decided by majority vote and not by experts? Government may be needed to ensure our freedom, but at what point does government make us unfree? Can there be a science of politics?

*Any upper level course with a CPO prefix may substitute for CPO 2002.

Political Science Electives: Students must take six 3-credit courses from the list of political science electives, below. Courses counted for another political science requirement cannot also be counted as an elective. At least four of these courses must be 3000-level or above, two of which are political science courses in the same sub-field. Up to three of the six courses may be "Electives in related disciplines" (see below). Students may, with approval of their concentration advisor, count as Political Science electives courses offered by the Political Science Department on the Boca campus that are upper-level {3000 or 4000-level} with a prefix of POS, COP, POT, INR, PUP, or PAD, so long as they are not courses offered at the Honors College, with approval of their advisor. Students are reminded they need at least 42 upper-level {3000 or 4000-level} credits to graduate.

HONORS THESIS

Students concentrating in political science must write an honors thesis on a topic within political science.

A good deal of research conducted by political scientists is quantitative, and students concentrating in political science are strongly encouraged to take a Research Methods course. All students concentrating in political science are strongly encouraged to participate in an internship or study abroad program with a substantial political content.
